POLITICAL INFORMATION.

OF THE DIFFERENT PARTS OF GOVERNMENT. Government falls naturally into three different departments: That part which makes the laws; that which executes them, so to preach as to impress on the hearts or carries them into effect; and that which and consciences of men the truth that there administers justice, or applies the laws between man and man. In order to maintain a free or popular government, it is necessary that these powers shall be lodged in different hands; that tion of that revival of religion which is the body which makes the laws shall have the mother of all the rest, when he came nothing to do with their enforcement, and that the judges shall be a body independ-ent of both the legislative and the execu-tive branches of the government. Where this division of powers is well established and carefully guarded, if at the same time the nation has sufficient intelligence and the New Bedford (Mas). Mercury relates, is public spirit to hold the rulers it chooses to a strict account, a people's liberties are reasonably secure, and they are able to afflicted as many other societies have been giller to the rule: A religious societies are cie ty in one of the towns of that State was afflicted as many other societies have been giller to the rule: A religious societies are cie ty in one of the towns of that State was afflicted as many other societies have been giller to the rule: A religious societies are cie ty in one of the towns of that State was afflicted as many other societies have been giller to the rule: A religious societies are cie ty in one of the towns of that State was afflicted as many other societies have been giller to the rule: A religious societies are cie ty in one of the towns of that State was afflicted as many other societies have been giller to the rule: A religious societies are cie ty in one of the towns of that State was afflicted as many other societies have been giller to the rule: A religious societies are cie ty in one of the towns of that State was afflicted as many other societies have been giller to the rule: A religious societies have been giller to the rule: A religious societies are cie ty in one of the towns of the rule: A religious societies have been giller to the rule: A religious societies have been giller to the rule: A religious societies have been giller to the rule: A religious societies have been giller to the rule: A religious societies have been giller to the rule: A religious societies have been giller to the rule: A religious societies have been giller to the rule: A religious societies have been giller to the rule: A religious societies have been giller to the rule: A religious societies have been giller to the rule: A religious societies have been giller to the rule: A religious societies have been giller to the rule: A religious societies have been giller to the rule: A religious societies have been giller to the rule to make their government as honest and effi and are, masmuch as the pew-owners had a cient as they please to have it. For at the elections they are able to remove those legislators who enacted bad laws, or that executive officer who carclessly or wickedly parish that could be legally resisted. Here failed in the proper enforcement of the laws. Thus the people not only rule, but are easily able to distinguish where the fault of misgovernment lies, and to apply the remedy. In our own govern-ment, this great division of powers is very clearly made: in the Federal Government Congress enacts the laws, but can not execute or enforce them; the President enforces the laws, but he does not make them; and the courts of the United States construe the Federal laws, and apply them in disputed cases. There is a still further subdivision which is of equal importance to good government, and which is called DECEN-

ON DECENTRALIZATION.

It has been found advisable, by experi ence, to still further subdivide the powers necessarily intrusted to government; to limit the general, or, as it is usually called, the central government, to the performs noe of certain offices or duties which apply equally to all parts of the nation; and to confide other powers and duties, having only a local application, to subordinate, but in their sphere independent govern-

This subdivision of power and authority is called Decentralization; and experience has shown that this political device is of extreme importance, for two reasons: First, it is a powerful and the best means of training a people to efficient political ac tion and the art of self-government; and, second, it presents constant and important barriers to the encroachment of rulers upon the rights and liberties of the nation; every subdivision forming a stronghold of resistance by the people against unjust or Take notice that any system of government is exceilent in the precise degree in which it naturally trains the people in political independence, and habituates them to take an active part in governing themselves. Whatever plan of government does this in a high degree is goodno matter what it may be called; that which avoids this is necessarily bad.

For in France the central go erament appoints all the local officers, and the condition there is as though the President of the United States should appoint not only the postmasters, revenue and law officers, who are properly part of the Federal executive, but also the governors of the states, the mayors of cities, the supervisors of counties, and even the justices of the peace and local police. The first time we had a bad man in the presidential chair he would be tempted by the favorable circumstances to play the part of Napole n, and make himself may of the state. Nor could the people, without graat diffi-culty, and probably revolution, resist him. To make liberty secure, the powers and responsibilities of the executive ought to be plainly limited and defined; and ought to be such and no greater, that even a bad man in the executive chair could not, during the term for which he is chosen, do serious detriment to the republic. For constitutions are made to guard against bad officers, just as laws are made, not to inter-fere with the good, but to restrain the vicious.

But if there be no God, there is no moral system which has any hold upon conscience, no occasion for remorse in view of falsehood; no fear of punishment if the crime escapes human detection. The oath being founded on this moral sense, it is evident that its abolition must follow the admission of atheists as witnesses.

The Illustrated Christian Weekly anawers the question, "What is Revival Preaching ?" After premising that real revivals are not to be traced to natural causes, not the necessary consequences of revival sermons, but are due to the immediate presence of the Spirit of God it still diste presence of the Spirit of God, it still allows that a certain manner of preaching is more conducive thereto .

That, then, is revival preaching which That, then, is revival preaching which tends to bring God directly into the hearts and consciences of men: which, as the parishioner said of Dr. Bellsmy's preaching, "makes man little and God big." There is a time for doctrinal instruction; and this may be a necessary prelude to and preparation for a revival. But systematic instruction in doctrine is accounted to and preparation for a revival. But systematic instruction in doctrine is accounted to and the results of the results of the results. instruction in doctrine is rarely revival age. Interment in Franklin.
